‘Rudy, never in my family or your ma’s has anybody gone to college. I’m not against college, I got nothin’ against higher education, but for chrissake, boy, you can’t even cut it in junior high. You’re just like your brother Johnny – you think dreams are more real than life. All I can tell you is, you better wake up and smell the coffee before it’s too late’ – his father said angrily.

Rudy walked Sherry home, declined an offer of hot chocolate and homemade pound cake, and walked back to his house, kicking a pebble all the way. He knew his old man was right; he was a lousy student. But he also knew Danilo was wrong. Without dreams there was no purpose to life, nothing to drive you on to greater effort and the chance of true fulfillment. Without goals to reach for, you might as well be a house dog or a cow out in the pasture sleeping and eating your whole life away. Each day like the one before with nothing new to look forward to. Thomas Edison had dreams, Henry Ford had dreams, Marconi had dreams- yes, and Knute Rockne had dreams.

In the bedroom he shared with Johnny and Frank, with the door closed, Rudy dropped a record down a spindle onto a small record player. He put the needle in the groove and sat back on his bunk bed to listen as he had so many hundreds of times before.

‘We’re going inside of ‘em,’ came the scratchy voice of Knute Rockne, worn by constant replaying. Rudy mouthed the words along with Rockne, his face intense, his fists beating on the bed in rhythm with the words.

Frank shoved the door open and barged into the room. He was holding a record of his own. ‘The new Elvis. Let’s give it a listen,’ he announced in a loud voice. He walked up to the record player and started to pull the needle off. Rudy shot up from the bed and stood between the record player and his much bigger older brother.

‘Hey, little bro, you know the stupid speech by heart,’ Frank said.

But as he listened to Rockne’s voice, its passionate rise and fall, the sincerity of the words, Frank’s expression softened. He sat down on the bed beside Rudy and ruffled his younger brother’s hair. Together, they listened.

...We’re going to go, go, go and we are going to stop until we go over the goal line...

There was the sound of players roaring as they charged out of the locker room – the very room, Rudy vowed, he would one day come charging out of, wearing the blue-and-gold uniform so rich in tradition and glorious history.

(Adapted from Rudy by James Ellison)
